When we speak, in the following pages, of the icosahedron, or in general of a regular solid, this expression is to be understood in an extended sense; namely, we do not actually operate with general constructions in space, but confine ourselves essentially to the sphere which is described through the summits of the regular solid, and to which we suppose the edges and sides of the regular solid transferred by linear projection from the centre of the sphere. The nearer object of our consideration is therefore a determinate partition of the sphere, and we only return for greater convenience of expression to the phrases, and in part to the constructions, of the geometry of space.
